that it pays better to raise standard bred poultry than the common barnor mongrel fowl. The standard bred fowls cost no more to raise, house or market than the mongrel; they eat no more and lay better. They are more uniform in size and color, and when dressed for market bring more per pound. Standard bred poultry can rough it as well or better than the common barn vard fowl. We, therefore, advise all who possibly can to raise good, strong, vigorous standard bred hirds. In order that this may be successful, there is no question about the "early batch" campaign that was so vigorously pushed last season and which is also being pushed. again this season. "Early batch" means "early lay" and summed up means more oney to the producer.
